Understanding the factors that drive rapid range expansions is important for forecasting species responses to global change. Range expansions of highly variable species, such as the house mouse (Mus musculus), are of particular interest because such species commonly undergo synchronous range expansions when climatic conditions become more favorable. The extent to which such range expansions are demographic or genetic in origin remains controversial. Here, we use nuclear and mitochondrial DNA data from overlapping collections of house mice that have been collected across 1.3 million km2 of Europe over a period of 50 yr to examine patterns of genetic diversity and population structure among contemporary house mouse populations. We show that contemporary European house mice are highly genetically diverse with high gene flow among populations (FST = 0.013; Nm = 1.47 × 105 bff6bb2d33
