The present invention pertains to the field of liquid filters. More specifically, the invention relates to pressure relief mechanisms for liquid filters. Liquid filters have been in use for many years. In these devices, a liquid is passed through an element or medium which traps solid or suspended matter that is present in the liquid. Ideally the medium would be capable of filtering the liquid, but have the appearance and feel of the original liquid. Unfortunately, conventional materials and methods of making such filters are not capable of satisfying this standard. Typical conventional filters cause a pressure build up in the filter which if not relieved rapidly, can cause rapid clogging and resulting malfunction or failure of the filter. In addition, present day filters tend to clog so that the liquid containing the trapped solids cannot flow properly. For example, reference is made to U.S. Pat. No. 4,828,899 to

Clark. In Clark, a filter element is held between two rubber grommet covers. A common drawback of the Clark device is that it is difficult to insert the filter element. Another drawback is that the rubber grommets may be so big that they do not allow liquid flow. U.S. Pat. No. 4,951,966 to Ristic et al. teaches a liquid filter with a suction valve. Ristic teaches the use of a flange to seal the perimeter of the filter element. This sealing is accomplished by placing a series of ribs on the filter element and having a flange on the filter element cover seal the ribs together. The location of the ribs on the filter element presents the risk of
