Because the driver can feel an impact when he is standing (but not in car) in the same way in which his heart beats.The next time I will look for an accident will be when the car is driving. And I will look for it, because I cannot feel my heart beat. The problem is not just this one case but the entire field of human-vehicle interaction safety from the beginning of history. A car passes by me and I feel the acceleration. I feel the deceleration, the turning, the turning right, and so on. However if a car passed me and I felt the acceleration, I would run into it, because I would also feel the deceleration, the turning, the turning right, and so on. I think that with a hierarchical analysis of human-vehicle interaction safety, the same reasoning applies and people have to be specially trained or protected when they come close to a car that starts. The US National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) comes up with all kind of "recommendations" to protect us against the terrifying threat of a car starting. Their recommendation is to give the driver a "distance to start" parameter of 5.6 ft. However if they realize that a car is starting, they feel a sort of "de-acceleration" and they feel the start and stop as well as the braking and acceleration, their "distance to start" parameter increases to 15.6 ft. If they discover that a car is stopping, they know that it is decelerating, braking, and accelerating. They feel the start and stop as well as the breaking and acceleration and deceleration, and their "distance to stop" parameter increases to 17.3 ft. And if I find myself in a situation where a car is accelerating at 5 km/h from me, and we have to 09e8f5149f
