TMN Reader Tom Saar writes on Boeing's test piloting of the Cutlass-C, with the first flight taking place on September 8, 2008. Inevitably after every airplane test flight, there's a period of trying to put the test-piece back together and its reassembly in the hangar. Test-pieces can be big and heavy. Some are bigger than an actual airplane. And they can be a lot of fun to play with when you do get them back. One of the things that I like to do is rip a hole in the bottom of the airplane. This lets me see the length of the airplane's fuselage and also allows me to lift out the main landing gear. But most importantly, I can move the airplane around. Even if that's not the purpose of doing this. We were testing the wings, so we wanted to see where the static load – the forces due to the compressed air that gives the lift – would be. The main reason that we do this is to ensure that the wing is positioned close enough to the fuselage to be able to see a shadow on the fuselage. This allows us to check the wing, fuselage, and fairings as one piece. If you don't, this job requires a lot of trial and error. The first test piece that we ripped a hole in was the forward fuselage of the aircraft. The hole was torn in a place where there was what appeared to be a painted surface – likely a lettering or a logo. I assumed it was painted there for testing, and did the work. This one was great for playing around with. It worked fine but when I opened the hole, I saw the fuselage was made of composite. I've ripped a hole in many composites, but I've never seen one this thin. It's only a few millimeters thick. To my knowledge, no one else in the program had seen anything like it. So we decided to keep the hole in tact and tear off the rest of the composite. This method allowed us to continue testing and repairing the aircraft. As we tore it off, the airstream over our heads passed through the hole. I could feel the air going through the narrow opening, so I thought it'd be cool to see a view from the inside. This is how one side of the fuselage looked

(CNN) -- A Pennsylvania county sheriff says the man who killed four people in a car wreck was driving drunk -- and fleeing a traffic stop. Law enforcement officials said on Saturday that Charles Carl Roberts Jr. was driving a Jeep Cherokee on a country road when it crashed into a tree. Roberts, 19, was taken to a nearby hospital for treatment of multiple injuries before his arrest. Willsboro Mayor George Morrison told CNN affiliate WKBW that Roberts was pulled over in a separate traffic stop on Friday for allegedly not having a front license plate on his vehicle. Morrison said Roberts apparently did not have proper identification and drove off, leading to the fatal car wreck. Morrison said the confrontation took place after the crash when police, who were called about the initial stop, tried to check on Roberts' condition. Roberts was charged with four counts of homicide. His bond was set at $1.5 million, according to CNN affiliate WTAE. The Jeep, driven by an unidentified passenger, also was involved in the collision.
