Help me about: For only one user of Craftsvoice that is my own personal contact in emails and on Skype. I have.. And have for now completely given up on voice over! :-) A: I am not sure what you are trying to accomplish with your current method of installation. I would strongly suggest that you learn how to properly use the automated installation tool (included with the AV driver) and that you keep a list of all of the hardware that you have installed using that tool. Doing things this way will help you determine what is installed properly on your system. Otherwise, you are going to be shooting in the dark, and if you ever need to reinstall your OS, you won't remember which components you installed. I have also heard that keeping a copy of the extracted Windows SDK is a good idea since it allows you to keep all of the components that were installed on your system so you can reinstall easily. If you don't keep track of all of the hardware that you have installed, you can end up with a situation where you have a USB device that is plugged into a USB port but you don't know which piece of hardware it was plugged into. When you attempt to reinstall Windows, you are going to have issues since the wrong driver will be reinstalled. This happens all the time. Software/Hardware that comes with a Windows driver includes Registry entries as well. When you install a driver, it is not just going to install the software and not register the driver in the Registry. It will register the driver in the Registry and unregister the driver from the Registry at the same time. Since you have your system powered off when you extract Windows from the installation media, it is possible that the software won't register correctly, and in this case, you won't be able to reinstall Windows correctly, since there will be no way to reinstall the driver software. It is unlikely, but it's possible. A solution that I have found for this type of problem is to run the free Registry scan that is included with the Windows installation media in order to clear out any invalid entries. This is a quick and simple way to identify if there is anything that might cause the drivers to not register correctly. // Generated by CoffeeScript 1.6.3 var ColorSeparator, colorTransform, hasPartialSupport = {}, hasSingleSupport = {}, supportsCssRGB = false, supports
